As an orator, again like Mr. Reed, his voice, though not deep, and though capable of but little modulation, was penetrating, and his perfect self-possession, his mordant sarcasm, his unconcealed contempt for the mass of his hearers, his vigorous directness, and his unfailing self-confidence made his speeches offsetive like. and practically dictator of the Republican party, so far as that body is concerned, would resent any parallel between bimself and Robespierre, the dictator of the Reign of Terrer. And if we are to accept the character of the great Frenchman as it is commonly regarded, or even as M. Taine has drawn it—the sacred crocodile worshipped by the savages of the Revolution—the resentment would be just. But the Robespierre of tradition, whose portrait has simply been filled out and grossly exaggerated by M. Taine, is not the real Robespierre, and between the real one and Mr. Reed there are some points of likeness that it is perhaps worth while indicating. Mutatis mutandis, it is by no means impossible to conceive either of them playing the role of the either. Fortunately for our own country and for Mr. Reed, there is no danger that either the opportunity or the temptation to carry out his ideal in the fashion that prevalled at Paris in 1703 can present itself, but it is not minimize and it may be versy, based apparently upon the informa tion contained in the United Press in Washington, there is excellent au o carry out his ideal in the fashion that arevalled at Paris in 1793 can present itself, prevailed at Paris in 1793 can present itself, but it is not uninteresting, and it may be instructive, to try to imagine how the hero of that period would conduct himself were he now at the head of the party in power at Washington. For that purpose, as we have intimated, a review of the character of Mr. Reed may afford some light. We have only to add that in suggesting the characteristics common to the two leaders we expressly disavow any wish to imply that there is a likeness in the characteristics not indicated.

the United Press. The comments of the American press on the attitude of Great Britain in regard to the Behring see controvielded to the British refresentations, and that pending the decision of the Behring Sea question, there will be no very serious enforcement of American claims; that the Canadian sealers which do not poach on recognized American reserves will not be pounced upon simply because they are within the disputed limits. This will avert any cause for interference by the fleet of Great Britain.

HALIFAX, N. S., July 12.—Advices from Antigon county report the prevalence of a peculiar kind of cattle disease. In its first stage it is mild; in its second stage it is malignant; and in its last stage its victims get wild, rush to the shore and in many instances drown themselves.
